Investigating Workplace Misconduct

In workplace investigations, witnesses often contradict each other on key facts or they interpret those facts differently. As an investigator, you must determine whose version (or interpretation) of those facts you believe. How do you make that determination? Are you confident that your approach to assessing witness credibility results in correct findings?

This breakfast briefing provides an in-depth analysis of credibility factors, including corroboration, plausibility, motivation, consistency, contradictions and demeanor.

The briefing also explores other factors that may influence an investigator's decision-making process, including implicit/unconscious bias, and provides guidance to reduce those concerns.

Finally, this briefing uses real world examples and fact-based hypotheticals to sharpen your skills in making credibility assessments.
